In my mind I do believe that TFS allows to checkin builds (eg..NET Core App) by itself. Yesterday, when checking in the VS project I got the following warning: You need to explicitly check in this project so that your changes are not being lost. (C:\source\dotnetcore.1.0\bin\release etcoreapp1.0\publish) When checking in this project, VS jumps into Options of the project and then throws: Unable to check in due to the following: Local changes to checkout are not allowed without previous changes to check out. PS: Currently the only way to check in a build is when pressing check in. A: If you just want to simply check-in your build project, you must first check-out the project. (By default, projects are checked-out to prevent developers from accidentally checking-in their local changes.) If you want to tell your project to build itself whenever you check-in a new build, then set your project to Always build in the Source Control explorer. Then, TFS will automatically build your project whenever you check-in a new build, as long as your build definition has been set to build your project, and no changes have 3e33713323
