To determine whether rostral compartment syndrome (RCS) can be identified in a series of patients with acute brachial plexus injury (ABPI) and to establish whether the development of RCS in patients with ABPI is a function of the level at which the injury occurred or is the result of the injury mechanism. Retrospective review of the hospital records of all patients with ABPI treated at our institution between November 1998 and January 2000. Level I trauma center. Nine patients with ABPI whose primary mechanism of injury was trauma to the brachial plexus. Not applicable. Compartment pressures and time to the onset of compartment syndrome. Despite the fact that four patients had complete paralysis and remained dependent, none experienced RCS. The most frequent mechanism of injury in this series was the aspiration of clear fluid into the lumen of the fractured clavicle. Compartment pressures in all four patients who had complete paralysis of the limb were
